PINARAYI VIJAYAN
CHIEF MINISTER, KERALA

The relationship between Government and media has a profound impact on the information to which the public has access. Governments rely on media to communicate with citizens, ensuring that they receive accurate and authentic information. Without a healthy relationship between the Government and media, public dialogue is impacted, which in turn impacts development, welfare and governance as a whole.

As the first state in the country to declare the internet a right to its citizens, Kerala witnessed a giant leap in the digitalisation process. The Government of Kerala introduced e-Sevanam, Kerala's official service portal, and m-Sevanam app, an app specially-designed for citizens to access Government services through mobile phones. Applications for 509 services, related to 58 government departments, can now be submitted online. Instead of visiting every government office for different kinds of services, citizens have a single-stop destination for all Government services. Similarly, this Media Handbook prepared by the Information & Public Relations Department is a one stop destination for both Government officials and media personnel. It contains contact details of Ministers, Officials, media houses and journalists. It will help both the Government and the media to get in touch with one another. This handbook assumes greater significance as it is a tool that could serve to ensure transparency and improve governance. Seeking authentic information through verified contacts is extremely useful in the normal course of events and particularly beneficial during crisis and disasters. The Media Handbook will also serve as a dependable source of official contact details for the general public as well.

S.HARIKISHORE IAS

Director, I&PRD, KERALA

Kerala is a state that enjoys complete literacy and has a vibrant culture of media intervention. Therefore, the government places a lot of premium on maintaining a very amicable relationship with the media. The media have evolved tremendously over the past two decades. In addition to the telecommunications revolution, the worldwide spread of democracy, market economies, and digital communications have led to a more globalized world, thus allowing multiple, competing media channels to take root. These changes are evident in our state too although the government continues to have its maximum reach through the print medium. However, all the major media houses in Kerala have a strong presence on social media platforms as well.

Providing citizens with adequate information on priorities, programmes and activities contributes to the legitimacy of the government. To be a legitimate player in the public sphere, the government needs to develop and maintain an effective communication capacity. The Information & Public Relations Department (I&PRD) has grown over the years as the nodal agency for information services and media relations in the State. The Department serves as a channel of communication between the general public and the government.

The Media Hand Book provides information about almost all news sources in the government to the media. At the same time, the wide database of our media personnel and government officials that is provided in the book serves as a bridge between the government and media. We expect that this will make a fair and smooth exchange of information between them.

The response of government needs to be accelerated in the context of the rapid digitalization era. Therefore, the PRD Media Hand Book app prepared by Information and Public Relations Department will enable the public to get the Media Hand Book in the digital format. The public can avail of the app from the Google play store.
